Chapter 1 by Eleana Fairbairn

The screams echoed down the corridor. I couldn't. But I had to. I walked reluctantly down the vast, dark corridor, being careful not to make a sound. The terrified screams grew louder and louder with every step I made. Until, I knew what would happen. That's why they sent me. The screams suddenly stopped. I looked at the floor. It was my turn now.

My mind fell on other things. Would I survive? Would I ever get home to my family? The floor creaked. I drew a sharp intake of breath. Did it know I was coming now?

I pressed on, this time being more careful. I watched where I placed my feet and watched that I didn't let my mind wander again.

I took a deep breath and opened the rusted, wooden door which lay in front of me. I squeezed my eyes shut. I knew when I opened them, I would never be able to forget what I saw. That was, if I lived.

I opened my eyes and shuffled forward. My gaze lifted up. In front of me lay the girl who the screams had belonged to, with a deep gash in her side. She lay in a pool of blood. She was too young, I thought. Too young to be killed like this.

pile of clean bones. I

I heard a screech, which made me look up to the ceiling. Amongst the darkness, I could see two gleaming, red eyes. I stiffened. That, I thought, would be the creature that caused the screams.
